The ridges on the FN's forearm were more pronounced than the Armscor's, so the shooter's hand was less likely to slip off when racking the slide.

Here's the kind of performance we want from a self-defense shotgun. This tight pattern from a buckshot load would be enough to deter any intruder. The Sellier & Bellot loads are interesting because the clear plastic shows the pellets inside.

Here's the difference the little things make: The big front post offered a good sight picture; the FN came with two screw-in chokes; and the sling swivel on the magazine cap makes carrying the gun a hands-free affair, should the shooter wish to exercise that option.
