Here's a view of the barrel selector on the F3, a forward/backward switch (arrow) located in front of the trigger and within the trigger guard. It was one of the oddest places we've seen this switch located, but it worked just fine and was never in the way of the shooter's trigger finger.

The F3's checkering was also a bit unusual, both in its pattern laid out on the stock and in the checkering itself, which was loose and round. Yet, we found it offered good purchase for the trigger-finger hand.

The F3's only physical enhancement was its beautiful stock, which bore a well-figured piece of wood that shimmered when turned in the light.

The F3's barrels sported a low-profile rib and integral fiber-optic sight. The gun came with extended choke tubes, which were clearly identified with the choke constriction and color-coding.
